THURSDAY: Glasgow's official position on daylight saving time will be decided next Tuesday night at an adjourned meeting of the city council but until that time the question remains a subject for widespread controversy.

FRIDAY: Glasgow's proud badge of progressiveness has always been the large number of cars seen on the square which resembles Saturday trade every day of the week. Saturday is still the big business day, however, when the farm trade converges on Glasgow from a large territory. What about parking facilities for peak shopping days? Last Saturday was a typical example of what happens when the Saturday load is added to the regular traffic. Every corner of the square was the scene of a traffic jam Cars on the square were unable to wriggle through narrow exits. Long lines of cars from North and South state and federal highways inched along to the business section bottleneck. Meanwhile, round and round the square whizzed cars whose drivers were gambling on the chance of a meter parking. One care was clocked going around the square no less than twenty-seven times in this aimless search for a stall.

THURSDAY: Paul Biggers is another booster of county fishing waters after hauling in a nice string at the mouth of Peters Creek. Included in his catch were two walleyed pike, the largest was a three and a half pounder that was a beauty.

FRIDAY: Too many motor vehicles operating over an obsolete system of city streets is a problem that is not peculiar to Glasgow alone, but shared by nearly every city of our land, large and small. Some relief from Glasgow's congested traffic could be obtained if regulations were set up to govern front door delivery to stores in the business section by large supply trucks. Every day in the week the free flow of traffic is obstructed by bakery and meat trucks stopping to double park before grocery stores, leaving but one lane open to traffic from two directions. Such deliveries require from five to thirty minutes, and bring not only traffic stoppages, but the double parked truck frequently hems in cars parked at the curb on meters which are detained from departure.

MAY 24 – MAY 28
